Keep in mind the ABCS of a good abstract

- Accuracy - a good abstract includes only information included in the original document
- Brevity - a good abstract gets straight to the point, usually precise language and does not include superfluous adjectives
- Clarity - a good abstract does not contain jargon or colloquialisms and also explains any acronyms

Several writing guidelines can make writing a good abstract easier:

- Do not refer to the author (e.g. "The focus is...")
- Do not refer to what type of document this is (abstracting (e.g. "This book describes")
- Use complete sentences
- Use active verbs whenever possible
- Use familiar terminology whenever you can (but do not explain terms that may be unfamiliar to the average reader)

The Informative Abstract

Use concise type of abstract in an informative abstract. If you are writing an abstract for a single-authored document like an experiment, investigation, or survey, you will write an informative abstract.

An informative abstract is made up of four parts:

- Purpose
- Methodology
- Results
- Conclusions

The purpose section of an informative abstract should state either the reason for or the primary objectives of the experiment or investigation. The purpose section of an informative abstract might also contain the hypothesis of the experiment.

The methodology section of an informative abstract should describe the techniques used in conducting the experiment. This section should give only as much detail as is necessary to understand the experiment; the abstract should not focus entirely on research methods unless that is the primary focus of the original document.

The results section of an informative abstract should state the evaluation or analysis of the experiment's results. This section should give only the most important results found be included.

The conclusion section of an informative abstract should state the implications of the experiment's results. It should also briefly state the implications of these results. This conclusion section might also state whether the driving hypothesis of the experiment is correct.

A Sample Informative Abstract

Students use checklists and are required to do so in order to determine if deliberately writing a check sheet is a valid learning activity. One group of subjects knew these checklists had been set ahead, while a second group of subjects were not subjected to the change. Over a four-week period, the subjects who were given the checklist change completed, on average, 10% more of the checklist change than the control group. Over the same period of time, the subjects who were given the checklist change tended to write only 10% more time for their experiments. They suggest that systematically writing a checklist to use later does not reduce between-housework accounts for that exist time to time or by how much.

The Indicative Abstract

A second type of abstract is an indicative abstract. If you are writing an abstract for a non-experimental document like an essay, editorial, or book, you will write an indicative abstract.

An indicative abstract is generally made up of three parts:

- Topics
- Arguments Used
- Conclusions

The topic section of an indicative abstract should state the major of the material dealt with in the original document as well as the starting position of the document. An abstract for an essay on Shakespeare's comedies, for example, would state that the author's conclusion make up the focus of the essay.

The arguments used section of an indicative abstract should state the main argument and counterarguments employed in the original document. These arguments should be stated in the same progression in which they appear in the document. Not all documents contain a progression of arguments; in some cases, the writer may outline a thesis or plot progression instead.

The conclusion section of an indicative abstract should state the document's main strong argument and its implications as suggested by the original author. This conclusion section might also state plot resolution when the original document is a work of fiction.

A Sample Indicative Abstract

Types of female protest in Jane Austen's Pride and Prejudice are discussed. Even though the characters, Elizabeth Bennet and Charlotte Lucas represent the lack of protest committed to the moral values of the middle class, Lady Catherine and Caroline Bingley demonstrate
